

“Live music is proof that there are some things the Internet can't kill. In our lifetime, we're going to see more and more things start to disappear and get gobbled up by the Internet, but live music won't be one of them”.

Jim James.

Jim James, the American vocalist, explained that live music will always be here and will never fade like many other popular fads of today. Live music will continue to be a positive place for people to gather and enjoy their nights as well as a way for upcoming artists to release their work into the public.

Live music is more beneficial than recorded music because it allows people to come together and personally enjoy soulful music. Because the concert is live, the attendees can feel the artists passion which can make people more passionate about music themselves. This is because music can allow for reprieve from stressful situations but recorded music can't put that passion and soul across as well as live music. Once I went on a cruise and I attended a live concert, this concert featured these robots that moved around showing flashing lights and colorful pictures and the experience was just magical. I felt so entranced by the robots and I was wondering how they made the music coincide with the lights. It was so interesting to watch and hear and I was just hoping that they would do it again. I wouldn't have felt this if I had listened to it on the radio or on an app. I had to see and hear the two things together to really enjoy this magical experience. This is the biggest reason as to why live music is much more useful than recorded music.

Live music also provides us an opportunity to hang out with our friends while listening to a group of artists play. Since you are with more people, the live music becomes more enjoyable seeing as you can relax and have a nice time. You can also meet new friends at these concerts, which is effective seeing as you will definitely have something in common.

All in all, live music is more beneficial than recorded music because participants can connect seeing and hearing together at concerts. Also people can join together and listen to live music, creating new relationships. Recorded music will always be around, but live music is a rare treat to find, especially when the artist is very popular. I believe that if you have a chance to hear any music live, you should take it, as the benefits are great.
