

The Excitement of Live Music

By: Ramya Chintala

Music is the language of the soul; it brings people together. Music is usually enjoyed in two basic forms, recorded or live. Recorded music can be heard anytime or anywhere you wish, but nothing compares to live music. The magical feeling of the beat echoing through your body and the energy of each crisp note in your ears is hard to match.

During a live music performance, you can truly feel the energy of the music. Whether in an orchestra, a symphony, or a solo performance, you can see the tremendous amount of practice and dedication involved. Although recorded music is far more convenient to listen to, it does not convey the passion of the performer as well as the listener.

Another aspect that makes live music better is its uniqueness. It is easy to alter a recorded song as it is to bite into an apple these days. On the other hand, no two live music performances are one hundred percent the same. A live performance can't be duplicated, which makes it irreplaceable.

While recorded music is definitely more commonplace in today's world, it simply cannot replicate live music. What makes live music so special, captivating, utterly real, is that you can't hit replay.
